The psychiatrist, Dr. Katharine A. Clay, said Maj. Nidal Malik Hasan began suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, depression and was hearing voices because of his intelligence work. She said he was acting suspiciously, and was agitated, was unable to sleep and had taken up smoking and drinking alcohol. Ms. Clay's remarks were based on a review of Mr. Hasan's medical and psychiatric records released by the Army and confirmed by Justice Department lawyers. Ms. Clay, who treated Mr. Hasan at the U.S. Army Medical Center at Fort Hood, Texas, in the two months before his shooting spree, was informed by Army officials about the records on Wednesday and spoke about them briefly at a hearing Thursday in federal court in Washington. The Army will also publish a version of her testimony, said Maj. Robert White, a spokesman for the U.S. Army's Military District of Washington, which has jurisdiction over Fort Hood. The documents offer a first glimpse at the mental state of the soldier whose attack left 13 dead and more than 30 wounded. Federal prosecutors say Mr. Hasan, an army psychiatrist who had opened fire on fellow soldiers, was found to have extremist ties and during the rampage was seeking out the enemy, the United States. It was the deadliest shooting at a U.S. military installation since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the first in the country since the Fort Hood shooting in November 2003, when a disgruntled, anti-war soldier killed 13 people and wounded more than 30. In her private psychiatric evaluations at the hospital, Ms. Clay found that Mr. Hasan was both fearful of what he had done and angry. "He was manifesting a great deal of anxiety, insomnia, worrying about his physical limitations, as well as his future," Ms. Clay said in an interview outside the court. "He looked very stressed out, worried, fearful and depressed." Maj. Alan Ehrenkranz, an Army spokesman, said that on Dec. 6, Mr. Hasan met in a restaurant with Mr. Ehrenkranz, who runs the nonprofit military fitness program Soldier Readiness Training Centers, and the
