Experimental and theoretical study of ionic conductance in NaBH₄. We have determined ionic conductances in molten NaBH₄ containing 40 wt % H₂O by density functional theory (DFT) calculations. The estimated conductances were strongly dependent on the H₂O concentration in the battery. The temperatures and pressure gradients of the NaBH₄ were estimated by canonical and Widom's methods of the DFT results. The estimated parameters were compared to those obtained by an electrochemical method and that were reported in the literature. Both quantities yielded qualitatively similar values. The deviation of the experimental conductances from the calculated ones was explained by the high diffusion coefficient of the protons and the presence of a conducting channel through Na(+)-H(+)-BH₄(²⁻), in addition to the expected one through Na(+)-BH₄(²⁻) at lower temperatures. The discrepancy between the DFT and electrochemical results, that we ascribe to the thermodynamic properties of H₂O, can be cured by a single-site model. It was confirmed that water may form a solid H₂O(₂) phase in the vicinity of the molten NaBH₄. The sensitivity of the experimental conductances to small amounts of water is a direct consequence of the concentration gradients of the protons at various temperatures. One day I decided to install this, and was a little bit worried because of all the negative feedbacks. I think I am too late, and try to install one day after I read all the negative reviews. I thought about it, most of the negative reviews are from 2017 when they were still using an older version of the app. But the app is perfectly working. I think we shouldn't be scared of something, let's try this one and have a try. To know more, read the details and comments below. What's New
